[Selected Problems in Industrial Relations and Human Resources – 16:545:620]

SYLLABUS Spring 2021

Class Meetings:

Synchronous online via Zoom
(for details, see Rutgers Canvas)
Thursday, 9:30am – 12:10pm

Prof. Tobias Schulze-Cleven
tobias.schulzecleven@rutgers.edu
OH: by arrangement via Zoom
(for details, see Rutgers Canvas)

Course Overview:

This doctoral-level course familiarizes students with cutting-edge research on the comparative political economy of work. Comparative political economy (CPE) is both a large subfield in (comparative) political science and a rich interdisciplinary space offering sophisticated concepts and tools for analyzing the political determinants of economic affairs across countries. Research on the comparative political economy of work is comprehensive, taking into account such topics as the evolution of market structures and company strategies, the development of welfare states, and the distribution of social risks. It has greatly increased our understanding of national differences and common trends, illuminating distributional conflicts in the labor market, at the workplace, and even within the family.

The course begins with a review of theories on the governance of work across advanced political economies. It then moves to contemporary challenges to the governance of work and the ongoing transformation of the institutions that societies rely on to manage the tensions between the realities of capitalism and the principles of democratic citizenship. Seeking to empower students to use CPE approaches in their own research, class discussions will highlight how scholars have conceptualized the drivers, processes, nature, and outcomes of institutional changes. Topics such as the evolution of worker power, policymakers' embrace of social investment and education, the politics of the platform economy, and the future of work(ers) will receive particular attention.

Requirements:

This seminar is focused on discussing the readings for each week. In turn, effective participation requires students to spend sufficient time completing and reflecting on these readings before each week's seminar. Thoughtful in-seminar contributions include critically assessing the weekly readings, raising questions for group discussion, and engaging with other students' comments. All students are expected to share a few paragraphs of reading response for eight of our fourteen sessions. The length is up to you (and can vary from week to week), but 300-400 words should suffice. Each week, responses are due on Canvas by 5:00pm on Wednesday.

Beyond the reading responses, there is flexibility in the format of a longer writing assignment. Students have the option of 1) completing a final exam, 2) writing a research paper, 3) doing a combination of a 10-page literature review and a 5-page research proposal, or 4) contributing writing to a collaborative project on the future of work(ers). Class time will be provided for presentations of students' writing projects. Topically, students should identify a (theoretical/empirical) question that has not been well resolved by existing studies and outline a theoretically informed empirical strategy to address this question.

Comparative Political Economy of Work

Evaluation:

Class attendance and participation: 40 percent
Short responses: 20 percent
Long writing assignment: 40 percent

Readings:

All readings can be downloaded from the course website on Rutgers Canvas.
